On a cool August evening in 1823, a party of trappers were gathering around their mortally injured companion. They were negotiating a solution to their dilemma. Hugh Glass, their tough veteran, lying on a makeshift stretcher, appeared to be dying from his mortal injury. Transporting him over the few days had caused a lengthy delay in the procession's progress. And there was still an extent of hundreds of miles to cover before they reached their destination in upper Missouri, where they would trade their furs for money.

The leader of the party, Captain Henry, felt the great loss of a good partner, who would have proved competent in their expedition to the western wilderness. While hosting the meeting, Captain Henry eyed Glass with pity. His mind couldn't help but flash back to the incident.

Days earlier, Glass went hunting alone in the woods, carrying his favorite reliable gun, Anstadt, with him. He came to a clearing where he saw signs of a deer. He heard a noise. He thought it was the deer. Then a pair of bear cubs came in sight, playing and nipping at each other. He was admiring the little adorable beasts when he heard another noise from across the clearing. He turned to look and realized it with trepidation, which he had very rarely felt in the face of all kinds of menaces. It was a grizzly bear, obviously the mother bear.
